Scores and Interpretation
Attachment Style	Score Range	Interpre	tation
Secure Attachment Style	24-35	Individuals with a secure attachment style tend to have positive expectations about relationships, feel comfortable with intimacy and closeness, and are able to regulate their emotions in relationships.
Anxious-Preoccupied Attachment Style	20-23	Individuals with an anxious-preoccupied attachment style tend to have a high need for closeness and intimacy, but also worry about abandonment and rejection. They may be overly dependent on their partner for validation and reassurance.
Dismissive-Avoidant Attachment Style	12-19	Individuals with a dismissive-avoidant attachment style tend to value their independence, prefer distance and self-sufficiency in relationships, and are uncomfortable expressing emotions or seeking support from others.
Fearful-Avoidant Attachment Style	5-11	Individuals with a fearful-avoidant attachment style tend to have conflicting desires for closeness and independence in relationships. They may avoid intimacy due to fear of rejection or abandonment, but also feel lonely when alone.

It is important to note that these attachment styles are not fixed and can change over time, particularly with support and therapy. Understanding a patient's attachment style can help healthcare professionals tailor their treatment and support to their specific needs.
